Full Details She is a Fellow of the Gerontological Society of America and the author of more than 50 journal articles and chapters dealing with various aspects of aging and caregiving. Her areas of expertise are gerontology and social policy. She is particularly interested in service utilization and the ways in which ethnicity and culture may impact service use. She has done extensive research on caregivers for persons with Alzheimer's disease, their needs, and use of services with a particular focus on ethnicity. Her interest and research on caregiving has expanded to include grandparents raising their grandchildren and she has many articles as well as two books that deal with this growing population, Empowering Grandparents Raising Grandchildren A Training Manual for Group Leaders Springer Publishing, 2000 and To Grandmothers House We Go and Stay Perspectives on Custodial Grandparents Springer Publishing, 2000. Her other books include Home Care In International Perspective Greenwood, coauthor Abraham Monk, The Frail Elderly Problems, Needs, and Community Responses Auburn House, Ethnicity and Social Work Practice Oxford University Press, coauthor, Paul Ephross and Community Care for an Aging Society Policies and Services, Springer Publishing, 2005. When age is perceived as incompetence, it can easily lead to discrimination that impacts human rights. Based on the premise that social policy must reflect human rights principles, this graduatelevel textbook views the challenges associated with aging as opportunities for policy development that stresses the rights of older adults rather than needs.<http://sva-jeanroze.com/xmedia/eaton-cutler-hammer-circuit-breaker-manual.xml>

The text distinguishes between “needs” and “rights” and describes those policies and services that best ensure that the rights of older adults are actually met—particularly programs that enable people to remain in their own communities so they can benefit from continued integration and participation in society. Issues and challenges surrounding such efforts, and gaps in social policies faced by specific subsets of older people, are critically examined. The book first analyzes current aging policies and rights and considers the Older Americans Act as a basic policy framework. With an eye to promoting independence, the book discusses issues of income, housing, transportation, health, and home care and what constitutes a “livable community,” along with policies that promote wellbeing and focus on preventing senior abuse and exploitation. Challenges faced by older workers are covered, as are issues particular to family caregivers, older women, and grandparents as caregivers. Gaps in social policies for LG BT seniors and older members of specific ethnic groups are discussed. Particular attention is given to global issues and aging policies in diverse countries and the ways in which they reflect human rights concerns. Each chapter concludes with probing discussion questions for classroom use. KEY FEATURES Presents a human rights framework for aging policy Distinguishes between needs and rights of older persons Focuses on policies and programs that can help older people to remain in the community Explores the issues and challenges of specific older populations Discusses global responses and concerns with regard to older persons and human rights Carole B. Carole B. Cox. Community Care for an Aging Society: Issues, Policies, and Services. New York: Springer, 2005.

RÉSUMÉ

Community Care for an Aging Society se révèle une ressource utile pour les étudiants, chercheurs, prestataires de service et décideurs. Le livre présente une solide discussion de questions complexes liées aux soins à donner aux personnes âgées. Il aborde plus précisément trois volets : logement, aidants naturels, ethnicité, et fournit une description détaillée de la programmation associée à chacun d'eux.

Community Care for an Aging Society, by Carole B. Cox, sets out to discuss issues associated with providing community services to older Americans by providing both theoretical and policy frameworks for dealing with these issues. The policy context for the book is American, but the topic is so thoroughly and sensitively handled that I think many Canadian readers will find it of interest as well.

Dr. Cox is a professor in the Graduate School of Social Services at Fordham University in New York. She has a Bachelor's degree from the University of California at Berkeley, an M.S.W. from Virginia Commonwealth, and a D.S.W. from the University of Maryland. Other related books by Dr. Cox include The Frail Elderly: Problems, Needs and Community Responses and her most recent book, Handbook of Social Work and Dementia.

Community Care for an Aging Society begins with a description of the elderly population and issues that affect them and their care providers. It then provides a detailed description of policies and programs in effect in the United States today relating to older people in the community. It offers chapters on three specific issues: housing, caregiving, and ethnicity. It concludes with emerging challenges and programs responding to the issues of care provision for older citizens.

The first section of the book deals with aging in contemporary America and notes the changing demographics of the aging population. As Cox notes, "[T]he need for care among the elderly is primarily related to physical and functional limitations" (p. 2). She thus very correctly addresses her attention regarding community care to the subset of older people most in need of attention. In so doing, she avoids the tendency to treat aging as a series of catastrophes and provides a balanced and proportional discussion of important topics like housing, health and social services, and caregiving.

Despite what the media have told us in recent years about a burgeoning aging population, recent research and population-based Canadian estimates show that rates of disability are, in fact, decreasing among the elderly. The 1991 Health and Activity Limitation Survey found 46.3 per cent of Canadians over 65 with a disability (for a total of 1,449,000), while the 2001 Participation and Activity Limitations Survey found only 40.5 per cent (or 1,452,000). Although the methodology changed somewhat between the two surveys and the results are not strictly comparable, it is noteworthy that while the proportion appears to have decreased, the total population of disabled seniors has increased slightly.

This book is framed within a number of important theoretical perspectives, including social exchange theory, continuity theory, symbolic interactionism, learned helplessness, ecological/environmental theory, and social constructionism. Furthermore, the discussion is driven by an exposition of values, both implicit and explicit. Explicit values shaping community service delivery include the autonomy of the family, the desire for freedom from government intervention, and the expectation of individual responsibility. Canadian readers may find that they differ somewhat from the anticipated American readership on some of these issues. Implicit values driving policy include a humanitarian care ethic, a desire for equity, medical dominance, and a degree of paternalism in attitudes toward the elderly. Cox also notes that North American society has a historical bias towards institutional care for the elderly and disabled, a legacy of the development of our health care systems. Finally, she notes that the ethnic composition of American society has changed over the past few generations, so that cultural sensitivity is an increasingly important value in dealing with older citizens.

This book is explicitly directed toward students in the health and social service disciplines, providers of community services, and planners and policy makers. As such, it has a number of considerable strengths. First, it resists the temptation to sensationalize issues

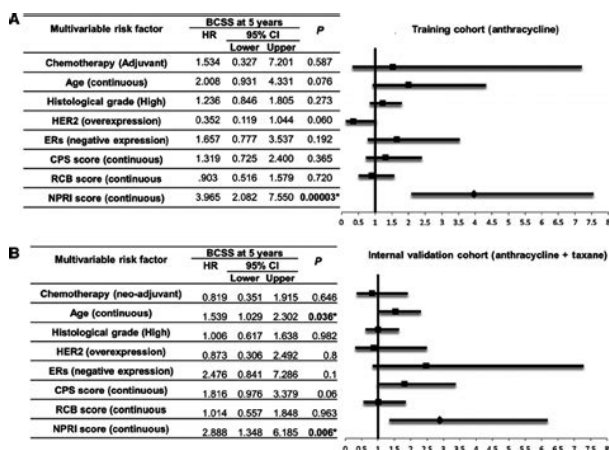

She is the author of more than 50 journal articles and chapters dealing with various aspects of aging and caregiving, with extensive research on caregivers for persons with dementia, their needs, and their use of services. Her recent work includes a study of the impact of dementia on the workplace. Her caregiving research also includes that of grandparents raising grandchildren, leading to the development of a curriculum, Empowering Grandparents Raising Grandchildren A Training Manual for Group Leaders Springer Publishing Company, 2000. She is the editor of To Grandmother's House We Go and Stay Perspectives on Custodial Grandparents Springer Publishing Company, 2000. Her other books include Home Care for the Elderly An International Perspective, coauthored with Abraham Monk 1991; The Frail Elderly Problems, Needs, and Community Responses 1993; Ethnicity and Social Work Practice, coauthored with Paul Ephross 1998; Community Care for an Aging Society Policies and Services Springer Publishing Company, 2005; and Dementia and Social Work Practice Springer Publishing Company, 2007. Families may find themselves unable to care for their older relatives, while formal services are often unavailable or inaccessible. Policies and services are beginning to focus on the community rather than institutions as the primary axis for care. This book examines the many factors contributing to needs for care among older persons as well as the ways in which impairments are defined and responded to by both the individual and society. Focusing on practice and policy issues, Dr. Cox describes many of the early stage community care innovations that hold the promise of making contributions to the wellbeing and independence of the older population. Group leaders can revise and expand upon the themes presented here to fit the needs of their particular work groups.

Some of the main issues that are explored are useful tips for grandparents on how to communicate effectively with their grandchildren on all topics ranging from drugs and sex, to sexually transmitted diseases; helping them learn how to deal with loss and abandonment issues; helping them develop and maintain self-esteem; dealing with special behavior problems; and appropriate ways of instilling and maintaining rules in the home. Designed to complement To Grandmothers House We Go and Stay, it is very readerfriendly and easy to understand, and can be read by anyone who has assumed a parenting role of any sort and is interested in raising a happy and healthy child. Social workers are in a unique position to address all these issues at the same time that they provide care for ethnicity in an innovative way, focusing on its many dimensions as encountered in various areas of social work practice individuals, families, groups, and communities and includes separate chapters on social services, healthcare, and social planning and policy development. Rather than attempting to address these issues by describing the traits of specific ethnic groups, this text presents the model of an ethnic lens. It is through this lens that ethnic groups are likely to perceive society, problems, the helping process, and the social workers who assist them. At the same time, social work practitioners perceive various ethnic groups through their own lenses, based upon their own experiences and beliefs. The effectiveness of practice and the establishment of a valid social work relationship depends to a large extent on the clarity of these lenses. Ethnicity and Social Work Practice is careful to avoid the twin traps of stereotyping or ignoring the importance of ethnicity, presenting a comprehensive conceptual framework useful to both students and practitioners. As the text links substantive themes to the ethnic perspective, it underscores the critical role ethnicity plays in social work practice, making it a significant contribution to courses in social work practice, cultural diversity, and human behavior in the social environment. This article discusses specific interventions social workers can use in working with these families. In addition, because their needs and problems are often systemic and not the result of any individual pathology, it stresses the importance of working with grandparents to help them become self-advocates and the role of social workers in changing unresponsive and insensitive policies and systems. Global Aging, Policy, and Human Rights 10. Policy Challenges in Meeting the Rights of Older Adults Appendix The Universal Declaration of Human Rights Index Preface The world is aging and, with any luck, so are we. Declining birth rates and longer life spans are contributing to the rapid growth of the older population. According to the United Nations, the global population of those 65 and older is expected to triple to 1.5 billion by 2050 with, for the first time, people 65 and over outnumbering children under age 5.

The issues evoked by an aging world pose new challenges with regard to employment, health, retirement, families, and the economy. Societies respond to these challenges in varying ways and these responses can be subsumed under the rubric of social policies. Such policies tend to reflect cultural values and attitudes toward aging and the roles and responsibilities of older adults and governments in addressing aging issues. As well as reflecting underlying perceptions of aging, policies can also influence them. To the extent that aging is perceived as a problem with people having increasing needs that drain a country's resources, older adults are vulnerable to discrimination. From this deficit perspective, aging itself is a problem and the role of policy is to meet the many needs of a dependent population. At the same time, as this perspective marginalizes and discriminates against older adults, it impedes their ability to participate in society and to remain productive and independent. The alternative perspective of aging policy presented in this book perceives the challenges associated with aging as opportunities for developing policies that are based on the realization of human rights rather than meeting needs. Such policies perceive older adults as creators of social capital that can be used to benefit both themselves and others. Whereas a needsbased approach further discriminates against older adults, a rightsbased approach acts to foster full integration. Human rights apply to everyone; they do not diminish with age. When age is used as a proxy for competency and functional wellbeing, many aspects of a person's life are threatened, including the basic rights of independence, security, and dignity. Moreover, impairment itself does not diminish the importance of these rights or of the role of policies in ensuring they are met. Thus, even those with chronic conditions that impede functioning share the same basic rights free of discrimination.
